Introduction

Increasingly, primary sources from the period before the emergence of digital media are being digitized. These “digital surrogates” have facilitated the work of (historical) researchers; instead of having to visit several archives, libraries and other places, the (primary) sources appear in front of them on their screen while they are sitting in their study at home or the university.

The physical places a (historical) researcher could visit to consult the sources (s)he was looking for were (and are) limited in number. The internet, however, is much vaster and, in many cases, more difficult to navigate. Searching for the wanted information in, for example, thousands of historical newspaper pages is often like looking for a needle in a haystack. Using Boolean Searches can facilitate such a search. In this video tutorial, a librarian from the University of Regina in Canada explains very clearly how to use them.

This overview aims at assisting in locating relevant sources for those doing research on, in particular, the (late) Ottoman Empire and the early Republic of Turkey. Some sources of a later date are also added. It is meant to be used not only by experienced researchers, but also, and even more so, by young and new researchers or even prospective researchers and students. As such it serves to support and supplement the courses elsewhere on this site.

The overview is an ongoing project. Although it will be updated regularly, one should realize that it is impossible to make it exhaustive, if only due to the rapid developments in the digitalization of potential source materials. Having said that, remarks, comments and suggestions for additions are always welcome and can be sent to Nicole van Os.

National Libraries

Many national libraries have digitalized their historical newspaper collections. Such historical newspapers may contain interesting information regarding the late Ottoman Empire and the (early) Turkish Republic. In most cases the newspapers are searchable. Sometimes they can only be browsed.

The digital collections at the National libraries of Australia, Austria, France, The Netherlands, Switzerland / Suisse and New Zealand are freely accessible.

For the UK and the USA such freely accessible digitalized collections do not exist. So, is e.g. The British Newspaper Archive which contains hundreds of historical newspapers (appr. 29 million pages) from the 1700s onwards from Britain and Ireland only accessible after subscription against payment. Articles from the archives of the New York Times are sometimes freely downloadable, sometimes only available for subscribers; the archives of the Christian Science Monitor, which was, in general, well-informed on Turkey and the Middle East (read: the late Ottoman Empire) are not available at the moment.
