Human rights violations in individual cases often represent structural problems that need to be addressed. This raises the question to what extent remedies and reparations can or should address this more collective or structural level. It also raises the question which actors can or should be the driving force in providing reparations. What role for judicial bodies?